Yet the problem is not unique to poor or developing nations. Indeed, it is a significant issue in many developed countries. In the USA, for example, more than 2 200 long-record streamgauging stations were lost between 1980 and 2005, even though the total number of stations in operation remained relatively constant at about 7 000 (USGS, 2007).

Hydrology Problems And Solutions

Hydrologists apply scientific knowledge and mathematical principles to solve water-related problems in society: problems of quantity, quality and availability. They may be concerned with finding water supplies for cities or irrigated farms, or controlling river flooding or soil erosion. Or, they may work in environmental protection: preventing or cleaning up pollution or locating sites for safe disposal of hazardous wastes.
