e. Natural economy - is a type of economy in which money is not used in the transfer of resources among people. It is a system of allocating resources through direct bartering, entitlement by law, or sharing out according to traditional custom. In the more complex forms of natural economy, some goods may act as a referent for fair bartering, but generally currency plays only a small role in allocating resources.

History of Thought on Nature and Economy Abstract. Aristotle (384/3 - 322/1 B.C.) was the first to develop a proper doctrine of the economy and is considered the founder of economics as a science - apart from Xenophon (430 - 354 B.C.) and his treatise Oeconomicus. Aristotle regards the economy and politics as separate entities.
