Abstract. Stereotype threat is defined as a situational predicament in which individuals are at risk of confirming negative stereotypes about their group. It is the resulting sense that one might be judged in terms of negative stereotypes about one's group instead of on personal merit. Research over the past 15 years has shown that stereotype threat contributes to low performance among African Americans, Latinos, and the poor, but also among women in math and science, the elderly in memory ...

Stereotype Threat Theory Process And Application

Stereotype threat can be stressful and distracting for people who experience it. For example, when someone is taking a difficult test, stereotype threat can prevent them from focusing on the test and giving it their full attention—which may lead them to receive a lower score than they would have without distractions.

What Is Stereotype Threat? - ThoughtCo

The theory of stereotype threat, first outlined by Claude Steele (1997), sought to understand how situations themselves can trigger a concern that one's actions might be viewed through the lens of a negative stereotype. Contrasted against long-standing debates over the role of nature (e.g., genetic variation) or nurture (e.g., early socialization) in explaining racial and gender differences in performance, stereotype threat revealed how the immediate context can change people's mind-sets ...
